Q: How does solar wind energy work? From what I understand, the energy behind solar wind comes from photons that collide with the ions in the solar wind and transfer energy that way. However, I'm curious how much energy this actually generates, and if photons really are a good candidate for energy transfer. A: Let's look at energy transfer from another source, the electromagnetic radiation that you see in the Sun. As you know, a photon is just a bundle of energy (I would expect you remember this from your previous physics studies). So when a photon strikes an atom, it will transfer part of its energy to the atom. In a simple calculation, we can assume a 10^{-10} cm³ liquid Helium bucket, containing a gas with a temperature T , and a photon of energy E_{γ} is struck by a photon of energy E_{γ} . We start by calculating a photon's energy in the rest frame of the photon:

$$E_{\gamma} = \gamma \cdot E_{\gamma}'$$

$$E_{\gamma}' = \gamma \cdot m_0 \gamma \cdot c = mc^2$$

Now

the energy the atom receives is

\cdot

So for every energy a photon has, the atom receives 2x the energy. From the atom's point of view this is 2x the mass of the atom as kinetic energy of the electron (and or nuclei). Now how much energy does the electron or the nuclei lose by transferring energy to the atom? This energy is Q , the photon's energy minus the atom's energy: $Q = E_{\text{atom}} - E_{\gamma} = mc^2 -$

$\gamma \cdot mc^2 = mc^2(\gamma - 1)$ So in this example, the electron receives an amount of energy equal to the difference in mass energies of the electron and the photon, and the atom loses its entire mass-energy. Of course, our description is somewhat limited. It ignores that the photon's energy is shared with two degrees of freedom - the position of the atom and the direction of the photon. So the
