Platform: Windows 8 x64 More: Download: the growing dependence on computer systems, various types of computer systems are commonly utilized. Users may access a computer system from anywhere in the world via various communication networks. In some situations, users may employ a plurality of communication networks to reach a destination, such as a company's website. Typically, when a user connects to a home network, the user must share all of his/her personal information, such as the user's login password, to the home network and/or device(s). Once the information has been shared, the home network/device may store the information within the home network, such as the home network's database. However, once the information is stored in the home network, it becomes accessible to any other networks that the user accesses. Thus, if the user travels to different networks, such as a company network, the user must share all of the user's personal information again.
